Their faces covered by dark visors and bearing the patch of a local fire department, they had just finished their shift but were excited to get out and go fishing. In their pockets, though, they had some other items: three rifles and three magazines of ammunition. One of them was from Texas, the other two were from Idaho, and they carried them out of the store, where they shot dead five people and injured two others before taking their own lives. In less than a week's time, on August 7, a group of strangers with guns moved through the center of the town of Kamiah in the state of Washington, just miles from the Canadian border. On Friday, the shooter was found dead in the motel room where he had been hiding out after the rampage. Eight days ago, the men from Texas traveled to Washington state from their homes in Idaho -- to Washington, to Oregon and back -- to hit a community where firearms are not typically owned and a place where they don't have a law to prevent them from carrying out their mission to kill other people. "Anyone with any knowledge of this case can understand why that would be the place he would look to get away," Bob Price, a retired police officer from Texas, said. "I guess there's some things we are not going to understand," he said. A late night on the border The three men -- all identified as Texas residents -- were close friends who had driven to Kamiah from Oregon and back over the course of four days, according to Price, who was one of the first law enforcement officers in the town. Kamiah is situated between the states of Washington and Idaho, on the confluence of the Columbia and Snake Rivers. It is roughly 70 miles south of the Canadian border in the most sparsely populated area in the United States. So far this year, more than 1,000 people have been killed in mass shootings in the United States.
