Locally accessible triplet-state spin coherence. We demonstrate in this work how strong local interactions can yield a profound influence on the dynamics of quantum systems. We focus on systems in which the electronic structure contains local states that have a strong ability to hybridize with the perturbing source, thereby creating a local spin reservoir that possesses a preferred spin orientation. By investigating the local dynamics of a spin placed in the vicinity of such a reservoir, we find a regime in which the effects of such states lead to effective mean-field Hamiltonians, thereby forming coherent superpositions of such states, while at the same time a loss of coherence occurs for the local system itself, with the magnitude of the loss depending on the strength of the hybridization. We show that a signature of this process is a peak in the local heat current at short times. We discuss why such local enhancements of heat can play a role in systems where other effects are ineffective.
