The device of the invention comprises an inductive loop, which is formed by a pair of loops which are wound around each other and connected at the ends thereof, and a shorting loop which is also connected at its ends to the loops and connects the loops to the primary winding of the inductive loop. The inductive loop itself is a torus winding. A device of this kind can be used in a high-frequency loop circuit to carry electromagnetic signals in air. The principle of such a circuit is described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,227,143, for example. The current circuit uses as the loop to be supplied a torus winding of an inductive loop. The main loop of the circuit is a second loop which has an inductance which is a multiple of the inductance of the primary winding of the inductive loop. The main loop itself forms a torus winding. The loop circuit as a whole has a resonant frequency of the order of the frequency of the current loop, and the current loop is formed in such a manner that a constant current flows through it. It is here assumed that the torus winding of the loop circuit is of such a shape that the closed loop formed by the windings of the loops is symmetric. In the device according to the invention, the shorting loop which has a sufficiently large cross section is wound around the torus winding of the main loop in such a manner that the loops which are connected to the shorting loop form two half loops in the torus winding. When a voltage is applied to the shorting loop, currents flow along the loops which are connected to the shorting loop, and the voltage is shared in such a way that each of the loops is connected to the shorting loop at one half of the total current. In this way, the two half loops of the main loop 77a5ca646e
