The virus is probably a Trojan, and by definition a destructive program, that's designed to give hackers the chance to do their dirty work. We are talking here about a piece of malware that infiltrates a computer through an infected email attachment. The program uses the infected PC as a makeshift safe place for hiding the malicious code, which enables it to get the opportunity to spread itself to the other PCs that use the same connection to the internet. In order to reach its targets, the virus uses several means, such as:

- Hiding the Trojan in a document file.
- Sending the file to a different folder, or even to the desktop.
- Sending it to a fake image file.

Once the Trojan is on the target PC, it activates itself, and within a couple of days, an entire network of computers becomes part of its system. Our virus experts see this as a low-risk virus. And once again we will stress 1d6a3396d6
