Rheological and chemical properties of the exopolysaccharide of the red-pigmented Bacteroides thetaiotaomicron VPI-5482. VPI-5482 is a strain of the Gram-negative Bacteroides thetaiotaomicron isolated from human feces. It produces a flexible exopolysaccharide that has been shown to be attached to the cell wall of this bifidobacterial species and to be a likely component of B. thetaiotaomicron's matrix. Here we present results showing that the exopolysaccharide was a pseudoplastic fluid or gel at low shear rates. At high shear rates, the exopolysaccharide was fluid. The pseudoplastic response was consistent with a yield stress that was dependent on the strain and state of cell growth and occurred over a temperature range of 4-45 degrees C. These findings are similar to those reported for B. vulgatus and suggest that yield stress is a general property of many exopolysaccharides produced by Bacteroides spp. The yield stress in the VPI-5482 exopolysaccharide occurred at a relatively low concentration (0.5 g of exopolysaccharide/100 ml of culture) and corresponded to a viscosity of 5.3 cP. The concentration and viscosity of the exopolysaccharide were influenced by its state of growth and the strain of Bacteroides species that produced it. The exopolysaccharide of VPI-5482 is similar to the exopolysaccharide secreted by some Bacteroides species but is different from the exopolysaccharide of B. vulgatus, which is a very viscous, elastic fluid. The viscosity and concentration of this polysaccharide may influence the growth and metabolism of associated microflora.

[Why does healthcare insurance pay for liver transplants in some cases only? An analysis of the case of Rhön Klinik in Bad Honnef, Germany]. Due to the increasing demand for liver transplants in Germany, many patients can no longer be treated successfully. This study compares the clinical course and outcome of patients with end-stage liver disease after transplantations at Rhön Klinik Bad Honnef in the years 2004-2009. The analysis showed that 31.1 % of patients transplanted at the Rhön Klinik are excluded from the insurance benefits due to borderline liver function, higher age and comorbidity. Other exclusion criteria also include a higher risk of death within the first year after transplantation. In patients fulfilling all of the exclusion criteria, there is a trend towards higher patient survival after transplantation with higher age and lower severity of liver disease. Patients with compensated liver cirrhosis experience a significant advantage in 1-year survival over patients with decompensated cirrhosis. The results demonstrate that not all patients with end-stage liver disease are eligible for transplantation and further analyses are needed to understand the reasons for excluding patients who could potentially benefit from such an intervention.

Q: What countries do you need to specify when you type in your UK bank account details on websites? I recently forgot my password to my bank account. All that I need to do is to change my password by logging in and typing it in. Of course I would like to change it because my kids could be generating big charges on my card easily. The only problem is that I had my account number, my card number and the security code. I want to change it because I left a bunch of money in there on a holiday trip last summer. It is not a problem so far, but I wanted to double check if there were some other countries that you need to specify. If I login through my iPad, I would need to type in my bank location instead of my country. Does anybody know where I need to specify my country (I guess it would be the UK, right?) and bank location when it is asking for my country and bank location in the login fields? A: It is dependent on the bank. I believe in the UK it is: account number bank location name of the account holder You might want to look into the notes on the top of the account page to see if it contains information about different types of accounts
