Altered morphogenesis in the chick embryo neuroepithelium as a result of reduction of DNA content. As a first step in the analysis of the role of DNA content in the early chick embryo, chick embryo neuroepithelial cells were dissociated and grown in vitro, their DNA content measured, and their behavior analyzed. Early embryos from various stages of development ranging from the 5-day-old chick embryo to the 16-day-old chick embryo had variable DNA content. For each cell type, there was a threshold DNA content below which the cells failed to proliferate. In addition, cells below a critical DNA content failed to differentiate. These observations are compatible with the idea that the DNA content of neuroepithelial cells serves as a limit on the number of divisions that can be accomplished, and that differentiation occurs only if the number of replications is appropriately limited. The cells of 6-day-old chick embryos were all capable of all types of division, but did not differentiate. This suggests that the full potential for differentiation exists in neuroepithelial cells at the 6-day-old embryo stage. In contrast, DNA content did not play a role in the ability of cells to migrate in a 2-dimensional plane, except at stages of development when the number of divisions was dramatically reduced. There was no correlation between DNA content and cell size, shape or fate. The DNA content of a few neurons was also measured; some neurons had DNA contents similar to that of astrocytes. One neuron with a high DNA content, and another neuron with an apparently normal DNA content, did not survive in culture after several divisions. These observations suggest that the DNA content of neurons may play an important role in their survival, and that changes in DNA content may be associated with the production of abnormal neurons. Uterine adenocarcinoma-associated antigen (CA-50): clinical experience with a new sensitive enzyme immunoassay. The new CA-50 antigen (Cancer Antigen 50) is an immunochemical reagent and a glycoprotein associated with the epithelial cells of many malignant neoplasms. We measured CA-50 levels in the sera of 75 cancer patients before treatment and every month during therapy, and in the sera of
