Five swans are now being raised at a Toronto aquarium to put their imprint on the city and the world. At first the swans were a bit anxious to find their new environment, but since then they have become more and more comfortable with each other, the staff said. The swans' time is now limited — every day they are spending hundreds of hours in an unnatural environment, where they are fed and trained, and they have been given their own spot in the barn, where they play, splash and wait for their human keepers to give them food. But five? "We believe that the best way to help the swans is to see them as part of a natural ecosystem, so we've been looking at this colony as if they
