IBM's Watson is getting ready to take on Apple's Siri IBM is readying a new version of its intelligent computing system Watson, in time for its second appearance at the tech giant's annual keynote. A representative from IBM announced to attendees of the Goldman Sachs Media, Telecom and Technology Conference yesterday that it was debuting a new version of Watson, its artificially intelligent system. The webcast to the conference was meant to be a fresh look at the so-called "Blue Jeans" generation of AI, a term coined by IBM. As a real-life demonstration, Watson built models on the ability of a shopper to match a product at a retail store to an exact detail, such as a kitchen knife, or an oven. The "Blue Jeans" generation of AI, as IBM is calling it, is actually a long-standing IBM insight that every person is a data scientist, which IBM claims is actually the case. In recent years, Watson has been trying to take on Apple's Siri, Google's voice-based search assistant. IBM has made it clear that Watson isn't Apple's Siri or Google Assistant, and is trying to carve its own lane as the world's leading voice assistant. In previous projects, IBM has demonstrated Watson's ability to understand natural language, speak in casual, everyday language, then translate the speech into documents. IBM has been adding more and more "natural language" capabilities to Watson to test its understanding of meaning and intent. The company has been expanding its approach to the use of natural language to test the power of its computer systems. The newer Watson "as a service" can be called upon to assist customers with the more common programming tasks. The prototype demo had Watson called upon to offer an answer about a Java error when a programmer was asked to compile a program. Watson proceeded to look up the wrong compiler, and then help the programmer find the right one. In its own research, IBM has found that the vast majority of computing tasks people have engaged in are based on language, and that the vast majority of people are willing to spend the time needed to assist with them. The newest version of Watson that was unveiled yesterday is much more than an answer to a programming problem. The demo also had Watson answer questions about VCRs and even cars. IBM is testing Watson's ability to help a customer find the VCR they were looking for in a hardware store, despite not being able to read the product name
