OS In the 90's, Windows supported a command-line scripting language named AutoIT, which is a successor of AutoLISP. It was created by independent programmer, Markus F.X. Lorber, based on AutoLISP as an alternative scripting language for Windows. AutoIT is not a full-fledged programming language as AutoLISP, but a pseudo-language. One can write many AutoIT scripts within a Text editor like Notepad. Although it is not a registered trademark, there have been several calls for the AutoIT developers to offer a licence. AutoLISP has been renamed AutoIT scripting language, but it still supports the AutoLISP notation. One can use AutoIT to make programs like the ActiveX control IsoBrowse, which is used to browse ISO-9660 and other mass storage formats. The scripting language supports a number of COM components (for example, it has its own graphic library named Gui and a number of useful objects for access and manipulation of Windows OS functions. AutoIT is being used in the home automation environment for the Xbox360. AutoIT also has a built-in tool named WinImage, which is an AutoIT component of a tool named Web Image Viewer, which can be used to save image webpages to image file in PNG format. Structure of AutoIT scripts A typical AutoIT script will include the script itself, then an event that it is supposed to take action upon (usually an AutoIt window is opened), and the code to perform that action. Examples: Line 1: 'Open a window myWin = GUICreate("AutoIT tutorial window", "1,1", "50,50") 'Tell it to be centered on the screen ca3bfb1094

An in vitro pharmacological evaluation was carried out with the calcium sensitizer LUF 545 in an attempt to understand its mechanism of action in in vivo tests. The pharmacological properties of LUF 545 were investigated in rats and dogs, and its efficacy and pharmacokinetics were studied in a rat model of cardiac failure induced by catecholamines. The drug increased contractility of isolated, electrically driven rat and dog left atria, and also in beating isolated rat right atria. These effects were concentration-dependent, and were blocked by verapamil and propranolol. LUF 545 was almost 100 times more potent than the positive inotropic effect observed with levosimendan. In addition, the drug was 2.5 times more potent than levosimendan as a negative inotropic agent. Its duration of effect was longer than that of levosimendan (5.4 +/- 0.5 vs. 3.4 +/- 0.5 minutes, p
