Oxidation of β -Cyclodextrin in Ophthalmic Delivery Formulations. The use of cyclodextrins (CDs) as drug carriers has been proposed as a promising tool for ocular drug delivery. However, the physical stability and in vitro/in vivo stability of CDs in ophthalmic delivery formulations, which are the basis of an effective drug delivery to the anterior chamber of the eye, is not well understood and characterized. This study aimed to elucidate the physical stability and oxidation of β -cyclodextrin (β -CD) in ophthalmic delivery formulations. Seven different ophthalmic delivery formulations containing β -CD (equivalent to 40 mg of β -CD) were prepared, and the physical stability of β -CD in each formulation was investigated up to 8 weeks. The oxidative stability of β -CD in seven different formulations was also investigated by determining the reaction rate constant (k) of the oxidation reaction of β -CD using a UV-visible spectrometry method. The changes in color and absorbance were monitored.

In 1989, John Heaton published a widely read guide entitled, "Writing English Language Tests." Over the past two decades, tests have become increasingly important in post-secondary education, and English language testing has assumed a major role in testing programs in . That familiar setting may be a classroom or it may be a computer lab, but it will most likely be at the university level. What might the issues be that lead to instruction which is merely a duplication of existing classroom activities in written form? For me, this question has come up because writing about learning is, itself, a task which requires
