PLGA nanoparticles are promising drug delivery systems with a vast range of potential applications. However, they are usually employed as biocompatible nanoparticles with biomedical applications. To improve the applications of PLGA nanoparticles in the treatment of arthritis, we prepared Tat-PLGA nanoparticles. For this purpose, Tat, a peptide of the transactivator of transcription (Tat), was used to modify PLGA by direct conjugation. Using Tat-PLGA, the growth rate of human U-2OS osteosarcoma and Jurkat T cells were higher than those of control nanoparticles. In addition, in vivo experiments demonstrated that Tat-PLGA nanoparticles showed more efficient uptake into U-2OS osteosarcoma cells than PLGA nanoparticles. In addition, Tat-PLGA enhanced apoptosis in U-2OS osteosarcoma cells in vitro. Also, in vivo studies indicated that a higher local concentration of Tat-PLGA was obtained at the site of administration. Among other studies, osteosarcoma cells treated with Tat-PLGA nanoparticles showed down-regulation of NF- κ B and bone mineral density in the Tat-PLGA nanoparticle-treated groups was increased.Nurses' communication with a patient who is switching smoking-cessation medications: A qualitative descriptive
