Typically, excavations are conducted by archaeologists to discover and classify native objects, including tools, statues, and pottery, that provide information about past cultures and society. Archaeologists typically study these objects through techniques such as process of elimination, determining the provenience of the object (the physical environment from which the artifact was recovered), examination of the object, and document the object (i.e., the occurrence and location of the object). Some of these methods are used to solve the riddle of how and why the ancient society constructed a particular object, while others are used to determine the purpose of the object. Types of found objects Found objects are usually divided into three classes: personal, manufactured, and iconographic, based on the degree of variability within the object. In addition to the diversity of the object, archaeologists use the object's context, material makeup, historical significance, art and craftsmanship, and provenience to determine how the object was used and how it has changed over time. Personal objects Personal found objects include anything the individual had on or with them at the time of death. These include funerary items such as

[url]>The present invention relates in general to the field of computers, and more particularly to a technique for efficiently printing documents on demand using wireless communications. The use of wireless network printers in a school environment has increased dramatically in the last few years, especially with the introduction of Department of Education (DOE) regulations intended to speed procurement and use of wireless equipment. School districts can use the wireless printer to save the cost and time that is associated with the printing of a large number of student reports and test records. Furthermore, the wireless printers provide an added safety feature by eliminating the need for wires and outlets in a shared, public school environment. For example, in the case of a fire and/or electrical outage, the wireless printers will remain functional as they do not rely on an external source for electricity. However, the use of wireless network printers has several disadvantages. For example, most connectivity schemes are subject to constant fluctuations, as the devices will try to reconnect to the network after failure. Since the office computers are typically provided from a common vendor, the network connection is likely to be of the same nature and typically has the same vulnerability to failure. While the rate of failure may not be constant, it can be rapid and potentially dangerous. A more frequent issue is the resource expenditure that is required for the common usage of the wireless printers. If the user(s) of the wireless printers had to purchase a new printer license each time they needed to print an additional record, the cost would quickly outweigh the time and money saved by printing on the network. Thus, there is also a need to reduce the amount of resources (e.g., computing power, bandwidth, memory, etc.) that are required to support a given printing activity to a minimum and,
