We assessed the effect of continuous positive airway pressure (CPAP) on pulmonary vascular resistance and the pressure in the proximal pulmonary circulation in 8 neonates with a median age of 11 days. We measured mean pulmonary arterial pressure (Ppa), mean systemic arterial pressure, systemic vascular resistance (SVR), and calculated left ventricular stroke work (SW). Our technique involved measuring the mean flow of the superior vena cava by a flow probe and the ascending aorta by a cuff. With CPAP at 2 cm H2O, the mean rate of rise of the superior vena cava flow (dV/dt) was higher than with intermittent positive pressure breathing (P
