“This is a fantastic step forward in playing ball physics in FIFA,” said FIFA Lead Narrative Designer Jacob Sanne. “It completely transforms the player experience and pushes AI to its limit. Our teams are using these new technologies to create in-game animations that recreate the twists, turns and explosive collisions that players make every day. We’re also using the data from this process to create highly believable player movements, animations, and player traits,” he added. Having used HyperMotion Technology, the Creative Assembly Creative Director and Executive Producer Dan O’Brien has a clearer idea of how the player will react to the animations on the pitch in-game. “Our players aren’t as wide in the hips or as agile as they are in reality, so it’s important to get the moves correct,” he added. “If they don’t, it ends up with players running in the wrong direction or coming out of the wrong angle when they shoot, which creates all kinds of problems. We used to have to create hundreds of animations for each player – we’re not doing that anymore.” The new feature also lets the Creative Assembly team run pre-production playtests on Windows, with the player in motion and reacting realistically to how they’d react in the game environment. The team has run full-scale plays using player movement data to capture key moments, like a player moving into a tackle to score a goal. “We’re using that in the game to perfect the moment and get the animations right,” added O’Brien. The data-capture process used by the AI in FIFA 21 has been retained in FIFA 22. The Creative Assembly, noting that there are challenges in making the network play experience realistic, is focussed on preserving the AI capability to make decisions at every moment during a game. The artificial intelligence system makes use of “Context Coherence”, which helps make sure every decision a player makes is consistent with the overall state of the game. That’s a difficult challenge when you have an AI making a million decisions every second. “You see in FIFA 21 how the players create beautiful runs, and they do it through hundreds of animations,” said O’Brien. “That’s very easy to do when you’re not using real players. We make a lot of runs
