Download. Munich, Germany -- (Reuters) -- Snap's âAscensionâ
on Saturday set the limits on Facebook's âInstagram-likeâ photo app and in doing so, set the stage for more battle over who gets to reap the benefits of the resulting craze for ephemeral images on users' mobile phones. It started with the Facebook acquisition of Instagram in 2012. The deal gave Facebook the dominant role in photo sharing on smartphones, and is widely seen as the beginning of Facebook's bid to own the next big thing, the way it owns the mouse. Now, consumers are uploading more Instagram-like photos to other social media networks such as Snapchat.

Instagram itself is counting on its popularity and continuing user growth as it battles with Facebook's parent company, which itself is suffering from sinking user growth. Snap's success comes after years of Facebook's struggles to diversify from its core ads business. On Saturday, the News Corp unit said that on average, two out of every five photos sent on Snapchat were created with its "Ascension" service. It claims to have 750 million users around the world.

"Ascension" is a phone app that creates a rotating picture, which is uploaded within the frame to the user's Snapchat account. Users can then open their camera and try to catch a glimpse of the picture.

“Snapchat is where people send me the coolest pictures. And Ascension allows you to send me the coolest pictures. It’s the best of both worlds,” said Evan Spiegel, the co-founder and chief executive of Snapchat. By comparison, the reported average number of photos posted on Snapchat per user last month was under 10, though Facebook said user activity on its photo service was up 30 percent over the past six months. Analysts said Facebook was likely to have
