What's new in Magnifico:

There is another good documentary by Cantonese director Wong Kar-wai, Summer Palace (1997). The film follows the adventures of a folk singer named Lai Wong Ching, who lives in the summer palace in Peking when Emperor Qianlong rules. He performs a set of songs explaining the virtues of Confucius, with acrobatic miracles and a spectacular Chinese Dream. Others are curious. Confucius? Dreaming of becoming a celestial is much easier than looking after the people. Summer Palace is an exquisite film. Her English accent is marvellous, and you can't help but wonder why she doesn't quite get arrested, or perhaps decides to give up her musical career and become a political activist, which seems to also be a prime motivation. That Hui Min has known him since they were kids and he still doesn't suspect that she's one of his followers is also almost funny, and it's quite obvious that there is a world of difference between his group and other renegades of that kind. He paints the life of a revolution and promises to step up the revolution after the film is over, but in reality he never calls it that. It's quite incredible that he believes that he could take the country peacefully, and without fighting because the entire management of the society is completely out of the scope of his plans. The film is framed in irony, and at times the contrast is almost off-putting. "Sontan no sompiku" - "Those who are after death are brave, those who are after life are wicked, those who are after neither are stupid". This is Le Jeu Belote's speech. "Sontan no sompiku", means seeing/beating/defeating everyone (nonsense/morality) and nobody (anything), and definitely doesn't mean that you're "blind". "Sonten no tsui" is looking for Someone. "Sonten no katsudou" is a journey, a quest. Le Jeu Belote (8PP/99) First prize in the Sunflour Festival, Barcelona, 1975, with Winfried Meier. A portrait of a Parisian couple at the time of the May 68 protests. The woman plays a blindfolded child, who is looking for her brother in the streets
