The X-Ray Impulse is 3D scanning using a laser beam or infrared light, a process that currently has no commercial use. By measuring the reflection from different surfaces, it captures the reflected light in a single image, which is then analyzed to calculate 3D information. To save this data, the software creates a file for each laser beam that the scanner shoots. Other than capturing the 3D shape and texture, it can also track the movement of objects and capture all kind of video footage. The scanner's tracker and the analysis software together have an interesting combination of skills, such as facial recognition. This information, which you can share with friends, can be browsed as a library. With the scanning process, you can capture photo composition, capture images, or document design in a very interesting way. To share the content that the scanner captures, the software lets you create a "screen capture", a local file that you can open with other applications. X-Ray Impulse is a product that has a number of attractive features. You can share the objects that you scanned online on social networks. The 3D objects can be browsed and displayed as a virtual digital model. A library of these 3D models can be exported for viewing in any other software, thus allowing for a real-time exchange of data.
