With Oscar night fast approaching, some awards prognosticators have begun to dust off their lists. It's all in good fun, but there's more at stake than making us crack open a beer and set about our annual viewing of the competition. While craft is a steadily growing segment of the beer market, that doesn't mean it is the future. A lot of folks still drink the mass-produced, lowest-cost beer. Yes, it's probably better than some of the swill that is pushing alternatives off the shelves, but that doesn't mean there's no room for craft, or at least for many craft breweries. Now, the word "craft" has become so widely used that it's hard to get anyone to tell you what it really means. But when I ask brewers, retailers and restaurant folks what "craft" means, the answers usually revolve around beer that is local, made with local ingredients, made with local process, sold locally and done in a sustainable manner. Mike Forsgren is the first to tell you "It means it's good." Meaning, in most cases, better than most other mass produced stuff on the shelf, and in some cases, better than other local stuff on the shelf. Forsgren is assistant manager at Lagunitas, but his first job was at The Black Sheep in Bellaire, where he worked for five years. He left the south side of town to head up the sales and marketing for Lagunitas. His beer tasted better than those in the other two T-Birds—(what our venue's fans call them) The Beast in Bellaire and The Beast in Oak Park—and the clientele backed that up. "The owner of
