Field of the Invention This invention relates to the automation of software updates. Specifically, this invention relates to reducing the rate of unauthorized access to the distribution infrastructure for an application program. 2. Description of the Related Art Typically, an application program (AP) distribution server stores a set of update information and allows users to download the new update information. The new version of the software is then transmitted to users by other entities, such as retail outlets, through the application program distribution server. In addition to users, software vendors and software distributors are often among the entities to which the new version of the software is transmitted. There are various methods for distributing the new version of the application program. One method of updating is to change the update information file on the application program distribution server. This method causes all users who downloaded the previous version of the application program to execute the application program again in order to download the new update information file. Another method of updating is to change the file associated with the application program distribution server. This method requires the update information file to be transmitted to all users through the application program distribution server. Yet another method is to make the change to the file which resides on the application program distribution server. This method does not require the previous version of the file to be transmitted to users, but requires the updated file to be downloaded through the application program distribution server. A number of difficulties are associated with the foregoing methods. For example, an inconvenience for users who may not have a connection to a computer may be associated with the transmission of the new update information file to users. In addition, a security risk may be associated with the transmission of the new update information file to users. A further problem is the difficulty in managing security risks associated with installing and updating an application program in a network environment.
