by Amo Cho Caltech, USA While several attempts were made to make Machinariae airborne, only one flight proved successful. On 25 June 1962, a Machinariae named 'Golf Copa' (one-sixteenth scale model) named 'Mouche' was successfully catapulted into the sky by Santa Fe Air Force Base's 30th Flying Training Squadron. Mouche successfully landed at Caltech in August 1962. In November 1962, the first fighter production of Mouche was built. This successful model set the stage for the production of a full-fledged airliner, the SF-85 Machinariae. The full-sized version, MSN, had a 980-cubic centimetre wingspan, with a cruising speed of around 400 kilometres per hour, and was also the world's first airliner certified to fly in the hover. But every epic tale comes with a sad ending. Due to financial and time pressures, the U.S. Air Force made the decision to cut the production of Machinariae. In 1962, the U.S.A.F. also began retiring its Hawker F8 Fury fighter jets and promised not to produce any further Machinariae.  L.M. Fountain; I.A. Hawes; A.J. Franco; D. Wildtmann; A. Introduction and flight success In the mid-1940s, during World War II, the U.S. and the Soviet Union worked for over two years to develop a habitable bomber, called 'Joseph Stalin' to carry heavy loads over long distances. Efforts to build this two-engined bomber were unsuccessful. It was time for two scientists: the U.S. Air Force's Research Laboratory and the Soviet Union's Institute of Aviation Motors to take up the challenge. The Russians were called back to their homeland to resume building R.V. SEREBYAN's Joseph Stalin. Within 10 days, the Russians had started to shape Stalin's fuselage, build the Lyulka Peculiarsky's (Peculiarsky's Zvezdochka's) (the shock absorbing drop tank), and form
