Rain washes most of the dust from the roof and our roofs are already leaky. In the West, we are used to getting frequent storms and sometimes even hail. But the kind of drought that leaves no amount of water to spare is something you might expect in a non-Western country. In India it was on the news every single night last week. Although for many people India isn't a country they'll recognize, a lot of their culture is like ours. Around the world, they cook with the same kind of stoves and heat their homes with the same kind of appliances. But here's the thing. They live with half the amount of water you are accustomed to. Most of the cities, like New Delhi, are built on a plain. The capital is built on the same plain, so as the sea recedes, it also retreats from the land -- in this case hundreds of meters.

Mr. Criswell pointed
