(AP) — Home sales for the Tulsa area continued to drop during the month of November, a trend that likely reflects a tightening housing market nationwide. The number of sales dropped 13 percent from the previous month to 1,464 units in November, according to the Regional Multiple Listing Service. Overall sales were down nearly 18 percent from October. It was the third straight monthly decline for the Tulsa area, and the only major regional market in Oklahoma to report lower home sales. "I am seeing more and more local agents that are concerned about the market," said Laura Harwell, a real estate agent with Century 21. "The worry is that if you can't sell, you won't be selling houses forever." Seller and buyer data were down overall nationally in November, but the sales decline was more pronounced in some areas. The sales drop was reported by the Northeast, South Central and West regions, and nationwide the sales-to-listing ratio dropped to an average of 1.9, down from 2.4 in the previous month. In the Tulsa area, the sales-to-listing ratio was 1.9 in November, down from 2.3 in October. "In general, we're still doing our best to keep our prices competitive," said agent Jonathan Riggs, who specializes in high-end home sales. "But, if you're not working, you're not getting paid." In September, the Realtors reported the first monthly decline in new home sales in the region since the late 1980s. Real estate analysts warned that year-over-year sales could drop as low as 6 percent in the Greater Tulsa area, although it could be considerably worse in the area surrounding Oklahoma City. A persistent supply of homes is one factor contributing to the declines, according to Realtors. But sales are being pushed down by mortgage rates that have risen by more than a full percentage point in recent months, and the decision by lenders to raise standards for obtaining home loans. The average home price in the T
