A method for analysis of fluorescence emission spectra of protein-fluorophore complexes is presented, and it is shown that the energy transfer from the fluorophore to the protein is accompanied by a general quenching of the fluorophore fluorescence. This method is based on the application of excitation-emission matrix spectroscopy (EEMS). From the two-dimensional excitation-emission matrix of the fluorophore and protein, it is possible to calculate the components of the fluorescence spectrum of the fluorophore, and from these the relative quantum yields and fluorescence lifetimes of the fluorophore in the presence and absence of the protein. This technique permits one to determine the degree of energy transfer from the fluorophore in a protein to the protein itself.// // detail/stream_executor_service.hpp // ~~~~~ // // Copyright (c) 2003-2012 Christopher M. Intercellular adhesion molecules of the immunoglobulin superfamily have been implicated in cell adhesion, migration, and lineage commitment during development. To determine the role of intercellular adhesion molecules in invasion of mesothelial cells by cocoon cells in the pericardial space in vitro, we blocked intercellular adhesion molecules and tested its effect on the invasion of cocoon cells into a human pericardial mesothelial cell monolayer. Immunologic mechanisms including anti-intercellular adhesion molecule-1 and -3 monoclonal antibodies and homologous intercellular adhesion molecule blocking peptides were used to determine the specific mechanisms of adhesion molecule involvement. Transmigration assays demonstrated that blocking intercellular adhesion molecule-1 or -3 effectively inhibited transmigration of cocoon cells into the pericardial mesothelial cell monolayer. In addition, cocoon cells adhering to the pericardial mesothelial monolayer were able to transmigrate following inhibition of the intercellular adhesion molecule-1 pathway. We postulate that cocoon cells invade the pericardial space and stimulate pericardial mesothelial cells to secrete factors that induce and maintain mesothelial cells in a state of hyperplasia. The secretion of adhesive and protease-inducing factors by cocoon cells stimulate pericardial mesothelial cells to undergo transmesothelial migration and may lead to pericardial effusion.Q: Complement of a free abelian group
