Large spontaneous intracranial hemorrhage from the intrathalamic and intraventricular diaphragm: a case report and review. A 46-year-old man with a history of hypertension presented to the emergency room (ER) with a 24-hour history of progressive headache and nausea. He was transferred from an outside hospital and taken directly to the operating room (OR) on admission for emergent hematoma evacuation. Imaging showed an acute left frontal, intraventricular hematoma, and magnetic resonance imaging revealed a right intraventricular hematoma. Craniotomy with evacuation of a large, acute hematoma revealed a hypertensive, hemorrhagic diaphragm in the right thalamus and right ventricle. The patient was anticoagulated and remained neurologically intact at 1 year after presentation. An illustrative case of a large spontaneous intracranial hemorrhage (ICH) from the intravascular and intraventricular diaphragm is described. The clinical presentation, mechanism of formation, management, and prognosis of this specific phenomenon are discussed. Although the patient did not demonstrate neurologic deficit, ICHs of this size are potentially fatal. A high index of suspicion must be maintained for ICH from the diaphragmatic wall to ensure early initiation of anticoagulation and prevent catastrophic intracranial bleeding.[Revision arthroscopic knee surgery]. Revision arthroscopic surgery for the treatment of loose of torn, injured, fractured, degenerative, old ruptures and stiff TKAs has been applied commonly in the past years. Typical reasons are recurrent pain and crepitation due to prosthetic or capsular impingement. In most cases the operation requires more than one procedure. Therefore, patients have to be informed about the respective long-term results of each of the procedures and the intermediate results should be verified by the patients. In most cases the operation is a compromise: more than one procedure is being applied to yield pain relief and mobility preservation.Ryan Brown (left-handed pitcher) Ryan Scott Brown (born March 31, 1992) is an American professional baseball pitcher in the Kansas City Royals organization.
