The utility of ultrasound in evaluating anterior cruciate ligament injuries: which imaging planes are necessary? When evaluating the anterior cruciate ligament (ACL), three main imaging planes are used: an anteroposterior (AP) scan and a 30° and a 90° Lauenstein-Hausler view. The goal of this study was to describe what imaging planes are necessary in evaluating ACL injuries and how these results compare with other available studies. A retrospective review was performed on 60 knees with isolated ACL tears on magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) between July 2011 and April 2014. All patients were imaged with both AP and 30° and 90° Lauenstein-Hausler views. Additionally, patients were examined with the aforementioned views supplemented with a complete set of axial and coronal oblique MRI. Imaging planes were evaluated for the overall degree of ACL tear, classification, and presence of associated knee
