A cell line was established from the Ewing's sarcoma (EWS) bone metastasis in a patient with osteogenic sarcoma. The growth rate of the cell line was higher than that of the normal bone marrow cell and was much lower than that of the normal bone marrow cell. Cell-cycle analysis of the cell line showed G1 cells almost equally distributed, while that of the normal bone marrow cell was nearly entirely in the S phase. The histopathologic features and other properties of the cell line were almost identical to those of the EWS tissue. The use of computer software and computers in the collection, storage, processing and dissemination of information is, of course, well known. Examples include the way in which spreadsheet software enables numerous types of data processing to be performed by users, and the way in which word-processing software enables text documents to be constructed and modified by users. An emerging technique for increasing the usefulness of such software and its user interface is to enhance the user interface with the use of virtual reality (VR) technology. In VR, a computer-generated representation of a virtual space is presented to the user. This space typically has three dimensions, and is often called a virtual 3D space. There are several different techniques for providing the VR experience, and may use an immersive display or, for less immersion, a projector providing a two-dimensional (2D) surface, projecting the image of a 3D space onto the screen. In this disclosure, the terms "immersive display" and "immersive display system", are used to refer to an immersive display and immersive display system that incorporates one or more immersive displays. For high-end VR environments the immersive display may be in the form of a stereoscopic display such as a head-mounted display (HMD) comprising a pair of glasses with each containing a display for the user's left eye and right eye respectively. There is also a growing interest in the use of multiple input devices. This has become particularly apparent since the advent
