Q: Why does one of my windows become lighter while flying past the sun? Today I noticed that I can see the sun over the airport's area airport in my horizon better than usual. I then realized that the light, which I noticed for some weeks, actually gets lighter for a short moment while flying away from the sun. Is this due to the aircraft's angle? Is this a common sight? I'm sorry if this question doesn't make sense. I just don't understand this concept. Edit: I'm using the Kepler 450 (4 engine) Edit2: Here is a link to the question I asked on Aviation SE. A: The sunsets over my airport are never lighter than normal. While flying by the sun, it gets lighter for an instant if the jet engine is on the left of the sun. (Looks like the top part of the wing is illuminated, not the tip, so it is reflected on the cockpit). The reason for that is very simple: When the sun is in the cockpit's field of view, the cockpit is illuminated too, making it lighter than it normally is. An aircraft is flying by the sun and see the sun falling below the horizon in the middle of the flight. The aircraft's altitude is diminishing and is getting too low to continue for the rest of the flight.

The pilot needs to turn around and level off at a certain altitude. The sun is moving away from the aircraft. In a few hours the sun will be too far away from the aircraft to illuminate it. The light is getting darker (that is correct) because the jet engine is on its right side and the wing is illuminated. The aircraft descends until the jet engine becomes 6d1f23a050
