Microsoft Toolkit is a famous tool used for the activation of windows and.The present invention relates to a process for production of granular fertilizer material. Fertilizers are manufactured by mixing phosphates with other basic materials such as lime, and carbonates, and with ammoniacal nitrogen in the form of urea or ammonium sulfate and then heating this mixture in a rotary kiln, i.e. granulating. In the prior art this granulating may be carried out either by spraying a free-flowing mixture into the kiln through nozzles rotating with the kiln, or by admixing an inert filler material with the fertilizer material in a tank or hopper in front of the kiln and spraying the mixture onto the kiln. In the latter method, the granulating can be carried out by either spraying a mixture from a rotary disc located in the front end of the granulator onto a moving supporting bed, or spraying onto the supporting bed formed in the rotary kiln from a rotating disk located at the end of the kiln. In all of these methods, the majority of the moisture and basic material of the mixed and heated fertilizer is located in the granules, which means that the fertilizer material will have a high density and, if the particle size of the material is large, the material will be difficult to handle. Also, the feed can be difficult due to the difficult to pass nature of the material. U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,193,971, 4,418,320 and 4,418,324 disclose processes for producing granular fertilizer materials, and in particular for the production of cationic fertilizer materials. In these processes, a moist, filler material of a cationic fertilizer, and a basic material, are mixed in a first tank, and the mixture is converted into a paste-like product by blending with an acid to form a sticky paste-like product that is then dripped onto the kiln. Prior art fertilizer granulating processes have also utilized a mixture of fertilizer materials with a high filler material content. The filler material is called inert and forms the bulking material of the mixture, and its quality and quantity are generally of 6d1f23a050
