I've tried looking at the documentation, but it was no help. Is there a simple way to do this, or do I need to use a hash? If it's the latter, which would be the easiest way to construct that hash? A: for (@myArray){ # do something } or my @resultArray = (); for (@myArray){ push(@resultArray, $_); } A: $_->[0] does exactly what you want. A: foreach (@array) {... } or my @resultArray = grep { $_ } @array; both are equivalent. EDIT: Perl will stop looking after the first successful match. So if there is no match, the array will be empty. If you want to collect all the matches, use the first method. To check that there was no match, use the second method. Keywords Abstract There are numerous applications that use single or multiple cameras for navigation through a dynamic environment. Although several commercial solutions already exist, many proposed solutions use too much energy and are limited in the range of motion they permit. We describe a new approach using off the shelf consumer electronics. It is possible to improve the efficiency of the device by using a simpler hardware architecture and optimizing the microcode. In a preliminary analysis, we have found it possible to reduce the power consumption by a factor of two while retaining or improving the overall performance. One option is to change a system clock by more 6d1f23a050
