I am trying to trim out the last digit of a string like this: >>> print re.sub('[^0-9]', '', '00010000') '000100' >>> But the output I am getting is not what I want it to be: >>> print re.sub('[^0-9]', '', '01000001') '000001' >>> How can I trim only the last digit? (not the first and last one) A: You need to use an anchor, so the regexp does not match the beginning of the string. >>> import re >>> re.sub('[0-9]+$', '', '00010000') '000100' >>> Also note that you can omit the print, as you want to substitute the string. >>> re.sub('[0-9]+$', '', '00010000') '000100' ^ means start of the string and $ means end of the string. ... 0 .. 1017 [#10] How do you imagine the world will look like after 100 years? Life in the future On a global scale, the leading industries for such growth will be education and healthcare. The developed nations of the world are expected to offer a better lifestyle to their population than is currently available. Economic success will be defined by individual innovation, and the rich will become increasingly reliant on a social safety net as their basic needs are met. Technology will continue to improve to meet the needs of those in basic service industries (trucking, retail, etc) but

Angular Directive inside another Directive I'm creating a which should be identical to the standard except for one thing: it should contain a custom directive (required/optional as follows): Option 1

Option 2 The is then defined in a parent's directive with a link function like this: link: function (scope, element, attrs) { linkWithinChild(); } And the custom directive: function linkWithinChild() { element.childNodes[0].onclick = function () { //

TODO: Implement }; } My problem is that I have no idea where to put this directive. Should I put it inside the directive definition, or the linking function? And why? A: Just put it in your directive definition: .directive('mySelect', function() { return { ... link:

function(scope, element, attrs) { //... }, ... }; }) Keep in mind that you are in a scopes hierarchy inside the element, not in his parent scope. If you need to access parent scope you can use scope.$parent. In this case you don't need to pass parent to the directive. .directive('mySelect', function() { return { ... link:

function(scope) { // scope.$parent.variable; // scope.variable; // if no parent, parent.variable; } ... }; }) That's the way AngularJS works. Q: How to find the all number of even and odd numbers based on a given value I want to find all the even and odd numbers.

suppose the number value is 100. 6d1f23a050
