This invention relates to a method of thermally treating molten metal that is being transferred along a continuously operating casting line, for example a continuous strip casting line with casting speed of 10 m/sec. When carrying out continuous strip casting of molten metal, a circulating line system is employed for the delivery of molten metal from one end of the casting line to the other end. The molten metal is delivered to the casting line in the form of one or more dosed quantities, usually of molten steel. When using conventional metering systems, such as for example manually operated metering tundishes, the amount of metal received by the casting line is discontinuous, and a relatively long period of time is required for replacing the metering system. In order to continuously deliver molten steel to the casting line, that is in a continuous casting mode, an appropriate metering system is therefore required. Many efforts have been made to develop an appropriate metering system for a continuously operating strip casting line. WO 96/31775 describes such a metering system, which comprises a plurality of additional tundish units linked to one casting plant by a casting line. The additional tundish units include a distribution unit and an outlet unit. The outlet unit comprises a heatable outlet section with a capacity for the discharge of liquid metal of approximately 50 to 100 kg/h. It is an object of the invention to provide a method of thermally treating molten metal being transferred along a continuously operating casting line, which avoids or minimizes the above mentioned problems and enables rapid and uniform heating of the molten metal being transferred along the casting line. This object is achieved in accordance with the invention in that the molten metal is
