He says that one of the engineers he spoke to was "gushy" about the new connector. USB Type-C is the standard for high speed data transmission between computers and other devices. It is commonly used to plug computers into displays and other peripherals. It was designed to be reversible so that both ends can be used to plug in. Beauregard says that the now defunct Mini DisplayPort standard, which has been deprecated since 2012, was "intended to be a one-way plug that was designed to only go into computers and not out." He says that this lead to problems with the cable being pulled out of the device during use. The USB Type-C standard was intended to solve these issues. Because of the nice design of the connector, he notes that "USB Type-C is expected to be a much more commonly used standard than USB 3.1 (the current high-speed standard which won't be a reversible standard for a few years, at least)." Beauregard says that new devices are in development that use USB Type-C, and that the connector is used in smartphones and tablets to connect to the computer. The connector will be used in laptops and desktop computers in 2014.
