Here we report that the antimalarial drugs can significantly alter the exposure of macrophages to Leishmania antigens, as well as the pattern of macrophage activation. These observations are promising, especially in the context of the Leishmania-induced pathology. Leishmania infection affects the immune system and the outcome of the disease may be determined by a fine balance of the regulatory pathways in a variety of ways. Studies analyzing gene expression in macrophages after Leishmania infection have revealed that induction of specific cytokines and changes in their receptor expression were the consequence of molecular pattern recognition^[@CR3],[@CR4],[@CR9],[@CR14]^ . However, anti-inflammatory cytokines induced by Leishmania can contribute to disease progression^[@CR17]^ . Therefore, balancing the pro- and anti-inflammatory responses is necessary for the successful resolution of the infection^[@CR22],[@CR23]^ . CCL2 is a mediator of macrophage migration and is important for the clearance of intracellular pathogens^[@CR15]^ . In our study, CCL2 was induced upon infection with either L. major or L. donovani promastigotes or protozoan-antigen-pulsed dendritic cells. These data are consistent with those published previously^[@CR13]^ . Activation of CCR2 with CCL2 was sufficient to confer the protective profile to macrophages upon Leishmania infection. Induction of CCR2 with CCL2 on Leishmania-infected macrophages resulted in the secretion of IL-12 and IL-10, which are cytokines required to control the Leishmania-infected macrophages^[@CR13]^ . These results demonstrate that CCR2 is a critical element in the signaling cascade during Leishmania infection, inducing the protective cytokine IL-12 and decreasing IL-10 secretion, ultimately leading to the immune-mediated killing of intracellular pathogens. These data are consistent with our previous findings that CCR2 is required for macrophage activation 6d1f23a050
