I was surprised to find that he did not speak standard English, but some kind of dialect unlike any other I knew. It looks like a mixture of an American dialect with northern Scottish. Among them were four elderly women, whose comments may shed some light on the plans of the DPRK leadership to revitalize its economy. "I believe in an economic policy based on the national fundamentals of the Korean people" said Kim Hwa, a 60-year-old woman. She had participated in the April 25, 2001 launch of the first satellite, also known as Kwangmyongsong-3. Kim Hwa is the last of the four and has emigrated to South Korea after living in Pyongyang for 25 years. She says, "Life in North Korea is hard. Of course, it's difficult to live under totalitarian rule, but the only thing we can do is to bring up our children, and I was always told to follow my conscience and conscience is the basis of life." For over half a century, after learning from Chinese economics, the DPRK continues to pursue an economic policy based on the paradigm of socialism, as voiced by Kim Il Sung and his son Kim Jong Il, as part of c6a93da74d
