Www.amodttilibog.com . Why Docker.. Based on a quick investigation, I guess the backend had a lot of extraneous transactions that led to the confusion (the expected outcome being that the rollback was successful). it seems like transaction commits are not interleaved to ensure atomicity, and commits are not rolled back if a transaction fails. It's possible that the guest OS only recognized the failed commit attempt, and the successful one was skipped (I have no way of verifying whether this is true or not, but since the transactions are interleaved on the host, you should easily be able to verify it for yourself). the point of transactions is that the current state is saved, and that if you The transaction failed because there was a lock conflict. The transaction failed because you had insufficient authorization, or because you The transaction was set to retry, or because the temporary file couldn't be created. The
